Hooked on Games

Playing video games can be a fun way to relax or spend time with friends. But for some players, playing games is an unhealthy habit. At night, they are glued to a screen. Schoolwork is difficult. The video-game world seems a friendlier place than the real one.

Mental health experts have taken notice. In June, the World Health Organization (WHO) added gaming disorder to its list of health conditions. A person may have the disorder if gaming has damaged his or her relationships with family and friends, and if it has affected his or her daily activities. Psychiatrist Clifford Sussman treats gaming addiction. He says kids often get angry when a parent stops them from playing games.

What makes video games addictive? Playing excites the brain's reward center. After a while, the brain becomes numb to pleasure. You feel bored without a controller in your hand, so you play even more. Sussman advises you should take at least an-hour-long break after every hour of play. The brain needs time to recover. Young gamers should answer a simple question: "Are you in control, or is the game in control?"
